For those of us on the faculty, the student show is always the high point of the academic year. It's the only time when we get to see in one place the work of the whole department.

And this year, as always, we're more than a little proud.

But this time is special. A little more poignant and bittersweet, because it's graduation time for a truly outstanding group of students. While the show is the work of all the students, this group of seniors certainly sets the pace.

It's a gathering of students who have shown an uncommon cohesiveness since their sophomore year, giving an unusual degree of vitality to everything that has happened in the department.

The "talent," industry and social warmth of this group of graduates will be missed.

Now when you're in the teaching racket, this phenomenon is, to a degree, expected. We veterans have seen it before, and we know from experience that these graduates will be replaced by others in the future, hopefully the near future, but also from experience, we know it'll be a while.
